Convocation

All graduates of the University automatically become members of Convocation, which, in a broad continuing sense, is life membership of the Australian National University. The University sees Convocation members as living links with the community at large. It seeks their help in explaining more widely the University's work in higher education and research; it also believes that Convocation can help to keep the University in touch with the needs and aspirations of the community.

The Convocation Officer is responsible for developing relations between the University and Convocation through organised functions such as dinners, cultural activities, lectures and return visits to the campus for Convocation members and their families.

More information about Convocation membership and benefits is in a leaflet circulated to new members. Graduates who have not received a copy should contact

Convocation Officer
Australian National University
PO Box 4
CANBERRA ACT 2600

Telephone: 062-494171/494144/492229.

Convocation name and address changes should also be sent to the Convocation Officer or to the Registrar at the same address.

The University

The Australian National University was created in 1946 'to encourage and provide facilities for post-graduate research and study both generally and in relation to subjects of national importance to Australia'. The University acquired a broad range of undergraduate studies and expanded its post-graduate studies with the association of Canberra University College in September 1960; and since that time it has operated in two distinct but interrelated parts — the Institute of Advanced Studies and the School of General Studies.

With Faculties of Arts, Asian Studies, Economics, Law, and Science, the School of General Studies functions as a teaching university in providing undergraduate and postgraduate training and facilities for research. Its enrolment of about 5700 in 1976 includes more than 5000 students working for first (bachelor) degrees and more than 650 for degrees of master and Doctor of Philosophy.

The Institute of Advanced Studies — a centre for research and training in research — consists of the Research Schools of Biological Sciences, Chemistry, Earth Sciences, the John Curtin School of Medical Research and the Research Schools of Pacific Studies, Physical Sciences, and Social Sciences. These fields of interest were chosen because of their importance to Australia or because they could be studied with advantage in an Australian setting. Most of the 350 students in the Institute are working for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, the majority holding research scholarships awarded by the University: half are from overseas.

The University has also several small research centres which are separate from the research schools and faculties: these interdisciplinary areas which include, for example, the Centre for Resource and Environmental Studies and the Humanities Research Centre, focus on problems of special interest for Australia and for tertiary education generally, and some of them provide specialist services to other parts of the University.

The Centre for Continuing Education promotes the study and discussion of current political, social and educational issues, and provides a wide range of courses for adults in the natural and social sciences and the humanities, including intensive language training.

The University Library contains about 850,000 volumes in several collections which are located to meet the different needs of research and undergraduate bodies. Other central activities include the Health Service and the Counselling Centre, the Instructional Resources Unit, and the Australian National University Press.

The University welcomes visitors to its landscaped campus which occupies an area of 130 hectares near Canberra's Civic Centre, bordered to the west by Black Mountain and to the south by Lake Burley Griffin.

A drawing of the silver stave presented to the University by the University of Oxford in 1950. The original Oxford stave is in gold, and was made by Benjamin Pyne, the 18th century goldsmith. The stave is carried before the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and the same practice has been adopted with the replica in this University.
